

Welcome

Christopher Pennisi*

Good morning. I am Christopher Pennisi, Symposium Editor of the Fordham Intellectual Property, Media & Entertainment Law Journal. On behalf of the entire Journal staff, I welcome you to “Symposium 2000: Fair Use, Public Domain or Piracy.”

Through the remarks and panel discussions of this symposium, we seek to answer a novel and difficult question for copyright students, practitioners, and scholars alike: “whether the digital exchange of copyrighted works should be permitted or prevented.” Through today’s keynote address and panel discussions, we will enter into a dialogue that has grown in gravity and depth with the recent explosion of Internet commerce — a dialogue that has not yet been settled in either classroom or courtroom. And so it is with great pleasure that I introduce the Dean of Fordham Law School, John Feerick.

* Princeton University, A.B., 1996; New York University, M.S., 1998; J.D. Candidate 2001, Fordham University.

A version of these remarks was delivered on October 6, 2000, at Fordham University School of Law during the Fordham Intellectual Property, Media & Entertainment Law Journal’s Ninth Annual Symposium “Fair Use, Public Domain or Privacy: Should the Digital Exchange of Copyrighted Works be Permitted or Prevented?” Footnotes have been added by the Journal’s staff.